indiebio: Sitting through an academic project video call and being frustrated, I jotted some notes on how to improve this. I am thinking more in the context of professional collaboration, but I think there is a lot of value to consider it at OMI too, especially with conversations with VAV1ST representing other-language users.

"online-first"

- The events are designed for online viewers first. The TL;DR is "optimise for the hallway track"
- The in-person component is more like a watch-party. They are still important for the "hallway track", in person conversation will always be very important. We're not trying to replace that.
- When people in the in-person meeting need to present or need to speak, they speak one at a time at a designated spot with their name filled in, just like anyone else in the world would. This is to force them being in-frame, being heard well and being introduced properly.
- The side chats are not limited to the video call, lost after the call ends, but more like Discord chats that remain over time and build institutional knowledge.
- Prepare content beforehand to be able to share material for people to delve into on their own, not reliant on the video stream only. Build conversation rather than broadcast.
- Ideally the presentations are also pre-recorded and shared on e.g. youtube before the meeting. So if people need subtitles / translation, they can have these. And then it's possible to listen at double speed, or pause to understand things better.

OMI is online first, it's good :).

There's quite a few joins on the Discord server, and is there a way to ping people, or have a welcome message, some onboarding style.

TODO: initialize as a framework.

Setting up a structured foundation that outlines the overall architecture and components of the project. This involves defining the key elements, relationships, and methodologies that will guide the data collection, analysis, and decision-making processes throughout the project. Think of it as establishing a blueprint for the project's data-driven approach.
